(For Spinet and sewing machine with scissors), World Premiere 2004

1st movement (Boredom): The spinet player is bored. (May be frustrated). He plays slowly and concentratedly, look carefully to the score. He plays as if exercising. The sewing machine player's play. 2nd movement (Work): Both are playing perfectly: like a (sewing) machine. At high speed. The spinet player need not sing in a belcanto manner. He's singing loud, with a thoughtful expression. He sings for himself. 3rd movement (Love): variable speed, running after the sewing machine, as a male after a female pigeon. The movement stops immediately, when each spinet note has been played.

Ulrich Clewing

The first art theorist who used the term Gesamtkunstwerk (total work of art) was Richard Wagner. In his essay "The Art Of The Future," published in 1871, he describes what he feels is the highest level of artistic creation: the combination of all arts—music, literature, painting, sculpture, architecture, and acting—making one complete work of art, the Gesamtkunstwerk. In his opinion this Gesamtkunstwerk could ideally only be an opera, not surprising for an opera composer. This also had the advantage that Wagners penchant for mythological material could easily be accommodated herein.

When asking about the historic roots of the concept of an integral interaction of all arts, one may come to the conclusion that such ideas and display formats already existed much earlier. During the Renaissance, ostentatious processions with music and dancing, with specially designed carriages, costumes and painted architectural vedutes were more frequent than commonly thought. Some of these temporary "decorations" found entrance into art history—one of the most famous examples being the fantastic decoration of a triumphal procession that Albrecht Dürer created 1512/13 for Emperor Maximilian I.

At that time, but also centuries later with Wagner, the Gesamtkunstwerk was subject to strict rules and, so to speak, characterized by stringent goal-orientation. The goal was always to express a certain content, to tell a certain predefined story, either to legitimate and glorify the regency of a potentate or to construct other, seemingly more depersonalised, but no less outdated mythological world views. This, of course, has changed considerably since then. It is only possible to still speak of a Gesamtkunstwerk today because the arts themselves have defied their boundaries and freed themselves from all strict rules—and this had consequences for the term, in the course of which its definition experienced a decisive modification.

The boundaries of the different genres have softened, become porous and permeable. The combination of the arts in a large work of art has, at least partly, been replaced by the combination of the arts in many small works of art. The development of the last years and decades has shown that things are coming together more and more: painting is still painting, but it may possibly have a good deal to do with dance, script or literature. The same can be said about sculpture, which, as an example, converges with architecture at first, only to emphasize their differences more explicitly. The scores of contemporary composers sometimes look more like drawings or color signals than traditional sheets of music. They do not use traditional scales and notes, instead they build their compositions with elements that must correctly be called noises and sounds.

This list could be continued endlessly. What is important is: If the artistic form is in itself synaesthetic, it is possible and even necessary to direct attention to other, until then neglected features of the Gesamtkunstwerk. In the "new" Gesamtkunstwerk, the practical experience of the performance plays a more and more prominent role, especially on an immaterial, quasi abstract level.

First of all, there is the nowadays not at all trivial factor that a group of artists with very different origins and cultural imprints actually come together in one place. Secondly, the audience plays a more important role, in which effect and participation go into an interactive relationship. One of the great revitalizers of the idea of the Gesamtkunstwerk, Joseph Beuys, expressed it in the following terms in an interview with the art critic Georg Jappe shortly after his discharge from the Düsseldorf art academy in 1972: A Gesamtkunstwerk, according to Beuys, is only possible in a societal space. Every person will be a necessary co-creator of it in a social architecture.

Beuys was obviously thinking of emancipatory, socio-political developments in society at large, in which art was supposed to be part of a general, enduring mission for education and training. "As long as the last person can't take part in the game, the ideal form of democracy has not been reached. No matter if artist, mechanical engineer or nurse: it's about all-over participation." Maybe the disposition toward social utopias has generally receded in the years since Beuys publicised his theses, but this only pertains to the pitch of the discussion. Its content is more topical than ever in the age of digitalisation.

Entering the Unknown

World Premiere 2004

Entering the Unknown is a total art piece consisting of a film from Birgit Ramsauer, and spinet music and music from a string quartet composed by Gloria Coates. It is a work expressing the frustrations of our time; seeing and being among crowds of people in a heavily populated world where there is no real communication or feelings for others. The people move as if on a treadmill, appearing like empty figures without faces and evoking feelings of anxiety and loneliness.

Abraham Lincoln's Cooper Union Address

World Premiere 2004

On February 27, 1860, Abraham Lincoln stood on the platform of the Great Hall of Cooper Union and delivered a brilliant speech which not only gave him the nomination but nine months later the Presidency of the United States. He proved that the founding fathers and our Constitution opposed slavery and the expansion of slavery into the territories. I have distilled Lincoln's text to a fragment of its length and created a narrative, graphic poem. The spinet is used percussively and the string orchestra is that of the first movement of "Symphony No. 1" composed in 1973, The projection behind Lincoln is from a naive collage on wood (1976) by Dorothy Cole entitled Abraham Lincoln. The composer—musicologist Kyle Gann interprets Abraham Lincoln. This performance will be slides of paintings by Robert Gwathmey, one of the first painters to paint the African Americans with dignity and my drawing teacher while I was a student at Cooper Union.

Gloria Coates, born in Wausau, Wisconsin, based since 1969 in Munich has divided her time between the USA and Europe. She began composing at an early age, winning a National Composition contest when she was 14. Her main professors were Otto Luening and Alexander Tcherepnin. After her Masters Degree in Composition she did post graduate work at Columbia University. She is the recipient of numerous commissions, prizes, and honors. She also attended Cooper Union Art School. She continued painting throughout the years; her paintings are seen on numerous CD covers of her music. Her experiments with vocal multiphonics were demonstrated in Darmstadt in 1972, but her main contribution was her own particular use of microtones which she began in 1962. She eventually developed her method to apply to orchestral works of which she has 14 symphonies. Although her music has been performed at leading festivals; Warsaw Autumn 1978, Berlin Festival 1981, 2004, New Music America 1989, Dresden Festival, and others; and by orchestras; Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra, Milwaukee Symphony, Brooklyn Philharmonic, Stuttgart Philharmonic, St. Paul Chamber Orchestra, and Kronos, Henschel, and Kreuzer Quartets to name a few, her music burst into international recognition since the 1990's through the CDs of CPO (orchestral music), Naxos (8 String Quartets,) and New World Records (vocal—symphonic music).

Dramaturgy of sound for spinet and digital sounds

The crime committed is about the language. Language that changing die, and revive in new forms. The language of a spinet and music today...language of solipsism and of collective artistic work. The scene is action of four characters there present that exhibit oneself, exorcizing the not linear nature of this music dramaturgy, as a story about the hybridation of the arts. They are Spinet, Audience, Teknè, Beauty. But crime require a victim, a guilty and a feeling of guilt: in this live sound set characters change in turn our role. Teknè love Audience, but Spinet, that from distant time fell in love for Beauty, now come under Audience's spell. Spinet promised to the sage Wandy that never had loved Audience, for any reason. But Audience turns one's look toward it, and her couldn't do without it. Teknè and Spinet was already met in New York, many times ago, between E 7th Street and Tompkins Square Park, when Teknè helped Spinet for some problems of its inner sound. But in that time Audience and Beauty was distant from their thought: even Audience was not still borned. Teknè and Spinet saw their and..."

Born in Rome in 1953. He is a composer, sonic researcher, teacher and festival organizer. His multimedia work Visionari, inspired by a collection of essays by theologin and philosopher Olivier Clément, was presented at the Cantiere Internazionale d'Arte di Montepulciano (1997). He was invited to present his work Poetico Notturmo Silenzio at the Ferienkurse fuer Neue Musik at Darmstadt. His dance work Il Sogno di Chuang-Tzu is based on the short stories of J.L. Borges. Since his early experiences with electronic music in the 1970s, he has moved away from pure post-serialist composition and embraced a more personal esthetic of sound dramatics. This has given his works a theatrical quality. His music is influenced by the relationship between sound, theatre and image. Today his interests lie in reseach into how music and drama have shaped the role of the performer.

Statement

L'Arte des Paesaggio, 2000
(The Art of Landscape)

L'Arte des Paesaggio was conceived as a sort of concert for harpsichord (spinet) and orchestra, in which the traditional orchestra is substituted by an orchestra of natural sounds. The structure is based on counterpoint and is reminiscent of J.S.Bach's "Die Kunst der Fuge."

The piece develops on the borders between game and sound-mirage, between irony and the twisted irony of fate. The landscape becomes a language, sign and score; it becomes a mirror for the fragility of existence when the heart stops beating, and at the same time it takes the form of mother earth giving birth to a child's singing.

Daily Exercise (handwriting performance for a Spinnet),
World Premiere 2004

The writer is doing daily exercises. Simply writing words and moving the body. While writing you will refresh and better remember the words—like while learning foreign vocabulary. So the performance has to create a written dialogue between words and Tai Chi movements—a close interaction between “eastern movements” and “western words.” The writer is working with a feather pen. The writing movements produce sound by touching the strings of the spinet. The words—keywords only—are extracted from the “Bill of Rights”—better known as Amendments to the US Constitution—the basic essence for our human rights. —T. H.

Notes for Birgit's Toy

The composer's attempt is the experiment of transferring the basic idea of the installation of the artist Birgit Ramsauer into music. The ancient Virginal composition of Giles Farnaby's "Toy" (Fitzwilliam's Virginal compendium), played on CD, will be layered and the live music of the "new Toy's composition "painted over" until it disappears. At the very end a contemporary "Toy" appears from the ancient "Toy," dedicated to Birgit Ramsauer's installation: "Birgit's Toy" is born (spinnet player Egino Klepper, recording by Cavalli Records).

Two-Manual Concept Works
for Spinet

In Life/was Silent but in Death I do Sing, World Premiere 2004

A series of sound art works based on the physical materials of music instruments. In these works for Spinet, a second electronic keyboard (manual) is played in addition to the spinet keyboard. Manual two plays samples based on spinet sounds recorded by Egino Klepper and processed by Matt Stine with Morrow's direction. Other realizations are envisioned with live sound processing.

Spinett, World Premiere 2004

The companion work for the two keyboard (manual) performance is based on Stine's sampled phrases from poet Gerd Stern's reading of his sound poem.

Birding Guide

World Premiere 2004

The instrument spinet with its flung-open top is, in my mind, always connected with the connotation of an odd mating bird. This happens even more intensely with Birgit Ramsauer's extremely colorful installation. The technique of this precursor of today's grand piano (German: Flügel = wing) tearing at the strings with feather keels to create sound is even more connected to the connotation of a bird. My composition "birding guide" searches on and within the instrument. It creates bird-related sound by using body parts of the bird (feathers, beak, eggs) as well as the movement of birds arranging their feathers. Instead of imitating the bird's sounds my piece is going to listen to the song of this bird-like object "spinet."

Artist's statement

Dialogue and exchange have always been very important for my installations, photography, performances, videos and poems. As/myself went through different professions/am deeply convinced that the different kinds of knowledge and experiences in the arts and science should be in an ongoing dialogue. In 1997, during the ART: HOME—LESS project, started to work with collaborators. Since the beginning of 2003/have asked different international artists to take part in the project "spinet" and become collaborators. The idea is an experiment on the Gesamtkunstwerk, to find a team of collaborators who will work together in a free exchange. And to grow into new dimensions within your own art by crossing borders and widening horizons within this concept in all different aspects of form, structure, age, concept, media, types of arts and nationalities.

Statement

Echo, World Premiere 2004

Echo is a performance art piece dedicated to the German artist Birgit Ramsauer and her installation "spinet—an experiment on Total-artwork." It is a multidisciplinary event with the "spinet" as its centerpiece, a vibrant reconstruction of a 16th century keyboard instrument. "The past meets the present in color and form." Echo intends to investigate this idea. Twofold in structure, it envisions a mirror effect: Part I—listen: the past lives in the present, Part II—question: the past "re-invented." Departing from William Byrd's The Bells, composed in the early 17th century, the audience is asked to engage in the significance of old music in the present. In contrast stands the second part of the piece, where the function of the historical instrument in the context of new media art is questioned and considered. Echo is not meant to denote a judgement. Rather it should evoke a critical outlook on existing notions of authenticity, genuineness and traditional values.

Many thanks to Egino Klepper for introducing to me The Bells.

Biography

Born 1971 in Zurich, Rosenberger's slight tendency to "nomadism" has brought her to collaborations all around Europe and the USA. Her work—acoustic and electro-acoustic music, installations and performance art—is often inspired and linked with the visual arts and inquiries into perceptual and phenomenological issues. She is currently studying composition with Tristan Murail and completing her PhD with a Faculty Fellowship at Columbia University in NYC.

Gerd Stern

Statement

Spinett, World Premiere 2004

Gerd Stern is a poet and visual artist. He has collaborated with sounds creator Charlie Morrow before this presentation of " Separate & Unequal." Speedy and irreverent the piece is vocalization breaking "in the beginning was the word" mind processors into syllabic frag. References, humor, consanguinity become meaningful. Listening is not the same as hearing if overstanding's a goal.

Biography

Stern, a founder of the 60's multimedia commune USCO and the group's electronicist Michael Callahan are working toward a three night late March event at Anthology Film Archives in New York and the recreation of installations for the Tate Museum's "Summer of Love" exhibition opening May in Liverpool. Stern is the author of three volumes of poetry. His oral history was published by the University of California, Berkeley in 2001.
